Yet there are many points of resemblance between them, as was natural. The older man of the two was John W. Mackay, who, from being a hand on a farm near Fort Hamilton, became the hero of the Comstock Lode, the main prop of the famous Hibernian bank of San Francisco, the really strong man of the firm of Flood, Fair, Mackay & O'Brien, later the multimillionaire, the part proprietor of the Mackay-Bennett bable, the man of a hundred gold-producing schemes. The young man who was walking with him was his son.

"Like father, like son." The phrase was before quoted above and may be used again. John W. Mackay, sr., is a quiet, retiring sort of a man outside of business matters, and his son L the same. They say that young John sowed some wild oats in San Francisco; but be that as it may, he is sowing none now. He was never the sort of a "high roller" that Senator Fair's wild sons were. The disposition he inherited from his father and Mrs. Mackay's sensible training were all in his favor, and as a result he is a man of common sense, his father's assistant in business, and he is getting such a training that he will be able to put his own hand on the helm at any time that it may be

He is like his father in ed in other college sports, however, that his main dissipation is the theater, John W. Mackay was the close friend of John McCallough and Law-rence Barrett, and McCullough used to like to tell how Mackay once helped him and his company out of trouble in San Francisco. Mackay was a strong admirer of the tragedian, as he is of most actors, and in this respect his son is like him. Young Mackay is like his father in another respect. He has that quality commonly known as "sand." They used to say of his father in the old mining days that he was sand from head to heel. He is the same way yet. A couple of years ago, when the crank epidemic was on, one of the species called upon Mackey and demanded a big sum of money under threats of blowing up everything. In less time than it takes to tell it, Mackay had the crank by the neck, ran him out into the hallway and booted him down a flight of stairs. The crank didn't come back.

he had the right sort of stuff in him when he went abroad to the rescue of his sister, the Princ as Colonna, and took her and her children from under the nose of the billiard and card-playing nobleman. To be sure, Mrs. Mackay planned the thing in the main, but it was young Mackay who carried the scheme through, and the fact that he astute father left the affair in his on's hands is an evidence of his confidence in the youth's ability. Mr.

He attends to business with his father and altogether is a very good specimen of the sensible young man of today. His father's wealth is estimated at from $75,000,000 to $125,000,000. What ever it may be, young Mackay will get the bulk of it some day.

He is a thorough Vanderbilt in appearance, in temperament, and all that and like nearly all the Vanderbills, he is as steady and reliable as a veteran wheelhorse. He is already fitted to take charge of his father's business. Under the tutelage of 'Professor Hadley, the eminent sociologist, young Vanderbilt has for some time een making studies in economics. Under this head comes those much mooted problems that effect commerce and finances and all attendant industries. Out of these studies may come a knowledge strikes, panics, famines, with their disagreeble attendant conditions, and some further knowledge as to the causes and effects of these evils. So when it comes young Mr. Vanderbilt's time to take up the business in which his father, grandfather and great grandfather won both wealth and fame, he will start well equipped.
